Useful mistake

There was a time, when we had a project called innovate. We had to make an innovation, so we made an app. Like any journey into the unknown, we encountered challenges, one of which was figuring out how to make the app's object smaller. It wasn't a blunder, it was simply a gap in our knowledge. So we had an appointment with a company to help us and they were really helpful and happy to see our app. They wanted to buy the app if it was done, so it was an useful mistake. We really didn't expect that they wanted to buy it. Well I think it was not really an mistake but an opportunity when thing go not well. We hadn't anticipated that our quest for help would lead to a potential was both surprising and exciting. We hadn't anticipated that our quest for help would lead to a potential sale. It made us rethink the nature of mistakes and challenges were they, in fact hidden opportunities? Perhaps, every wrong turn could be a chance to discover something new and valuable.

To specify the problem it was the lack of knowledge at our side, but the problem was also an opportunity. But we didn't know that as first when we were at the company for help it was very clear that this problem was at the end very useful.

In conclusion, the innovate project became an opportunity. What started as a problem ended up as an opportunity. It was a lesson about embracing challenges, seeking help when needed and recognizing the potential within every obstacle.